Background information, justification and examples of use

The Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, the most widely used study edition of the masoretic text of the Hebrew Bible, uses a large number of specialist symbols in its critical apparatus. Almost all of these are provided for in ISO/IEC 10646, either in the Letterlike Symbols block of the BMP or in the mathematical alphabetic blocks of the supplementary planes. One significant symbol used in the Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia is currently missing from the Universal Character Set. This is the symbol that denotes a Samaritan text source (usually the Samaritan Pentateuch), the form of which is based on the Samaritan letter shin (sometimes called shan). The use of this symbol is not limited to the Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia; it has been used by Biblical scholars and publishers as a symbol for Samaritan text sources for several decades (see, for example, Eissfeldt, Otto. The Old Testament: An Introduction. New York: Harper & Row, 1965.)

As the illustrations below demonstrate, the symbol is used in combination with other indicators to identify specific Samaritan sources, and is used in apparatus adjacent to other letterlike symbols. For this reason, it is desirable to have the character encoded as a letterlike symbol rather than using the corresponding letter from the proposed Samaritan script block, since the latter would have inappropriate (RTL) directionality. As used as a symbol in textual apparatus, this character has left-to-right directionality. Use of a Samaritan alphabetic letter with right-to-left directionality would create problems when the symbol is employed adjacent to characters subject to bidirectional layout.
